About the Conference

In many respects, the history of Christianity is as much a history of division as it is of unity. In the past two millennia all too many Christian churches and traditions moved away from one another and went their own individual paths. We are living in exciting times in which these paths are beginning to intersect once again in multiple ways. Through recent developments in ecumenical dialogue, separated Christian churches have begun to appreciate anew that what they share in common is, or at least should be, far more important than what divides them. While ecumenical dialogue has not resulted in full visible ecclesial unity, what has emerged is a new climate of improved relations between churches which once were sworn enemies.

Beside the important gains made through multilateral dialogues between multiple churches, which have made much progress due to ecumenical organizations such as the World Council of Churches (WCC), churches have also gained a great deal through bilateral dialogues. This can prove especially fruitful in healing wounds of the past. Today, there is almost every possible combination of bilateral dialogue that might be imagined. And yet, one of the rare yet vital exceptions is dialogue between the Orthodox and Eastern Catholic Churches. These Churches have endured a very complex and at times tense relationship with one another (not simply theological but also political and ethnic).

In many cases these tense relationships remain to this day. Indeed, in some cases and various contexts, they have even increased in difficulty (for example, the Ukrainian context). One of the key stumbling blocks between these churches are the widely differing perceptions of what these Eastern Catholic Churches represent and their disparate ecclesial views. Regardless of historical accuracy, many Orthodox Christians refer to these churches as “stolen” (despite the fact that most of these churches did not even emerge from so-called processes of ‘uniatism’ nor ‘proselytism’), while on the Catholic side they are seen as bridges to the Orthodox traditions (a perspective which, again, many Orthodox strongly reject). Acknowledging this situation, and in order to focus attention upon all of these challenges, we decided to name our conference “Stolen Churches” or “Bridges to Orthodoxy”? We are aware that this title theme may strike some as somewhat provocative but it serves to illustrate the differing and polarized positions on both sides with regard to the ecclesial status of Eastern Catholic Churches.

We hope that this conference will help draw out the subjectivity of differing ecclesiological standpoints with regard to the status of these churches and therefore help move toward an ecumenically oriented breakthrough in understanding. It is our intention to provide the opportunity for theological impulses to emerge that we hope may result in advancing bilateral dialogue between these two traditions (while acknowledging of course that, de facto, the Eastern Catholic Churches are today part of the Roman Catholic Church). We seek to gather together official representatives of both these Christian traditions, as well as scholars (especially theologians and historians) from the differing contexts where the tensions are greatest to see if we can help move dialogue and relations forward in this area. Through this conference we seek to overcome ecclesial stand-offs of key historical moments as well as in recent decades.

This conference is a joint venture of the Academy of Diözese Rottenburg-Stuttgart and Ecclesiological Investigations Research Network, for which this gathering marks the 13th international Annual Conference.

Travel Arrangements

Stuttgart has its own major international airport, which is located near the convention center. Alternatively, you can fly to Frankfurt and take a direct train from Frankfurt Airport to the Stuttgart main railway station. This trip takes between 1-2 hours.

Convention Center Address:

Academy of the Diocese of Rottenburg-Stuttgart
- Convention Center Hohenheim -
Paracelsusstrasse 91, 70599 Stuttgart

Tel: +49 711 451034 600; Fax: +49 711 451034 898

Those arriving with public transport from the main Stuttgart train station can take U-Bahn (tram) U5, U6 or U12 to Möhringen, from there you go with the U-Bahn (tram) U3 to Plieningen. From Stuttgart airport you can take the S-Bahn (City train) S2 or S3 to Vaihingen, then U-Bahn (tram) U3 to Plieningen. Distance from the station Plieningen to the convention center is 300 meters (take the first street in the direction of travel - cross the roundabout, then go right). See map 2.

Those arriving by car can go via the A8 motorway from Ulm or Karlsruhe: Exit 53a "Flughafen / Messe" in the direction of Plieningen. Take the main road through Plieningen to the junction "Universität Hohenheim". At the roundabout at the inn "Wirtshaus Garbe" turn right into Paracelsusstraße. By taxi from Stuttgart Airport to the convention center it will take about 15 minutes. See map 1.
